

Malaysia: Part of Asia's booming medical tourism

Medical tourism booms in Asia with patients spending money travelling to hospitals in South-east Asia.

The lines snaking into Bangladesh's overwhelmed hospitals are often so long, says Nusrat Hussein Kiwan, that they extend into the street outside – too many patients seeking too few quality doctors.

Bangladeshi woman Nusrat Hussein Kiwan poses in front of the International Patients Centre reception area at a private hospital in Kuala Lumpur. – AFP/MANAN VATSYAYANA

So, through a Google search, the wife of a Bangladeshi construction executive chose a Malaysian hospital for her heart bypass surgery.

"It's peaceful here, and my doctors are good," Kiwan, 65, says during a post-op check-up at a Kuala Lumpur private hospital, looking full of life in an orange headscarf and sparkling gold bracelets.

"I didn't expect to be as good as before. But I'm better."

Kiwan spent US$20,000 (almost RM70,000) on the procedure earlier this year, joining a booming global medical tourism market that is seeing particularly rapid growth in South-east Asia.

US-based industry resource Patients Beyond Borders estimates the world market is expanding by 25% per year – it reached US$55 billion (approx RM192bil) with 11 million medical tourists in 2013.

International medical tourism began to gain ground in the 1980s as Latin American countries such as Costa Rica and Brazil offered relatively cheap dental, cosmetic and other procedures to US and European patients driven south by high costs.

But the one-time niche market has developed into a multi-billion-dollar industry as developing-world health systems improve, global aviation links spread, and the Internet broadens patients' horizons.

Procedures vary widely from fertility treatments in Barbados, to cosmetic surgery in Brazil, heart and eye operations in Malaysia, and gender-reassignment in Thailand.

Perfect storm

The sector benefits from a "perfect storm of an ageing global population, rising affluence and greater choice in quality hospitals," says Josef Woodman, CEO of Patients Beyond Borders.

Alexandria Garvie from Australia poses following a tummy-tuck operation at a private hospital in Kuala Lumpur. International medical tourism gained ground in the 1980s with countries such as Costa Rica and Brazil offering relatively cheap dental, cosmetic and other procedures to US and European patients. – AFP

"This is particularly true in Asia, where disparities in quality of care are driving millions of patients to countries such as Thailand, Malaysia, South Korea, Taiwan – and even the US and UK – in search of medical treatment not yet available in their homelands."

"The near-term growth potential is significant," he says.

Increasingly, major Asian players like India, Malaysia,

Singapore and Thailand are aggressively promoting treatments at up to 80% savings compared to developed nations, with some companies arranging package trips that combine a nose job with a little beach time.

South-east Asia, in particular, is considered a medical-tourism "sweet spot," with decades of solid economic growth creating high-quality medical systems that remain competitively priced.

Patients come from both rich and poor nations, the former driven by high costs at home, and the latter seeking better-quality care.

Malaysia's market has nearly doubled since 2010, reaching 770,000 patients and US$200 million (about RM697 mil) in revenue last year, according to government figures.

"We are behind Thailand for sure, but we are giving Singapore a good fight," says T. Mahadevan, head of the Association of Private Hospitals of Malaysia.

Thailand says it attracted 2.53 million medical tourists in 2012. Though its figures include spa tourists, that's a one-third increase in just two years, a period in which revenues nearly doubled to around US$4.2 bil (about RM14 bil).

In Singapore, medical tourists spent US$630 million (approx RM2.2bil) last year, a figure likely inflated by the modern city-state's relatively higher costs. Patients Beyond Borders estimates Singapore draws more than a half-million treatment-seekers annually, mostly from neighbouring Indonesia, where health systems lag.

Malaysia set up a special body in 2009 to streamline and organise industry players.

Patients Without Borders calls Malaysia "medical travel's best-kept secret", noting the widely spoken fluent English and far cheaper medical costs compared to Japan, the United States, Europe and other key clientele sources.

“I would come back here again. I would definitely recommend it,” Alexandria Garvie, 61, says from her hospital bed in Kuala Lumpur after a tummy tuck.

The US$5,000 procedure – around one-quarter of what she would have paid at home in Australia – was performed at the Beverly Wilshire Medical Centre.

The company also recently opened a new branch near the border with Singapore to entice patients from the more affluent city-state.

Most medical tourists to Malaysia, however, are well-heeled visitors from less-developed Indonesia, followed by Indians, Japanese and Chinese. Future growth is expected from the wealthy Middle East.

Sun and silicone

Ancillary businesses have sprouted.

Beautiful Holidays, based on the northern Malaysian island of Penang, connects overseas clients with local cosmetic surgeons, arranges their accommodations, and shepherds them to pre- and post-op check-ups.

But it also arranges drinks, dining and sightseeing in Penang, know for its historical sites, beaches and cultural melange.

“The idea is to have people come here for holidays – sun and silicone, that kind of thing,” says Tony Leong, the company’s programme director.

Ashley Higgins, a 30-year-old American, has used the company twice, first for a breast augmentation, then a nose job.

She was initially wary of going under the knife on the other side of the globe, but price concerns won out.

“The hard part is trusting people when you are 1,000 miles from home. I felt comfortable coming here,” she says. – AFP

Sources:

<http://www.thestar.com.my/Lifestyle/Health/2015/01/02/Malaysia-part-of-Asias-booming-medical-tourism/>

Malaysia voted third best place for retirees

KUALA LUMPUR: Malaysia has been voted the third best place in the world to retire in.

Top spot in the 2014 Retirement Index went to Panama. Second spot went to Ecuador.

The Index was compiled by International Living magazine which has been scouring the globe for the best retirement destinations around the globe for over 30 years.

Said Jennifer Stevens, executive editor of InternationalLiving.com: “The world’s top retirement havens for 2015 may dot the landscape from Asia to Latin America to Europe, but they share certain assets.”

“They’re safe, offer good value and are places you can settle with relative ease,” she added in the statement announcing the results.

Malaysia, the top retirement country in Asia, earned high scores for ease of fitting in, entertainment and amenities, as well as low cost of living. A meal with a bottle of wine can cost as little as $5 and a visit to the doctor just $15.

Its full report on Malaysia said, inter alia: Influences from across Asia and beyond have melded together here to create an extraordinary cross-cultural melting pot of customs, dress, architecture, and cuisine.

The countrys diverse ethnic mix makes being a stranger here easy. Whether you live in bohemian Penang or Kuala Lumpur, the countrys hip capital, youll meet friendly locals who are happy to stop and chat and welcome you into their home.

Malaysia has both public and private health care with medical expertise on a par with western countries.

Most hospitals and health care facilities are staffed by English speaking professionals with international qualifications. Internet coverage here is on a par with services in France and Italy.

And with some of the worlds most stunning white-sand beaches, there’s a lot of like about Malaysia.-Bernama

Sources:

<http://www.thestar.com.my/News/Nation/2015/01/04/malaysia-third-in-world-as-retirement-home/>